The Citadel's final outline however was formed much later, in the 1870's. It was then that Fort Winiary became the most vital element of the fortification ring surrounding the city-fortress.

The museum itself is housed by the 1872 Military Laboratory shelter. In the well-preserved interior there is an exhibition of military objects, documents, photographs, plans and relics from the fortress fittings of Poznań Fortress. The greatest attraction of this permanent exhibition is an open-air military equipment park with over a dozen military vehicles, planes, helicopters, tanks, numerous cannons, guns and mine-throwers. The oldest exhibits come from the beginning of the 19th century.

The museum is a branch of Wielkopolskie Muzeum Walk Niepodległościowych (Greater-Poland Museum of the Battles for Independence).

About: The shelter at Babimojska Street in Poznań was built during the modernization of the south-west section of the Poznań Fortress in the years 1903–1904. It was made of concrete as a infantry shelter. During the Cold War, the search for an effective method of counteracting the effects of the use of weapons of mass destruction, especially on the civilian population, began. In search of a safe place to coordinate these activities, attention was drawn to the former objects of the outer fortress ring of the old Poznań fortress. An infantry bunker at Babimojska Street was selected and converted into a Civil Defense bunker. The area was fenced and the façade was covered with earth, a boiler room was added and installed diesel engine with generator and filtering devices, and the inputs were modified.
